FDA approves viruses as food additive

Not long before the printing of the KIMA Journal Issue 9 article "How much can we trust something that is FDA Approved," federal health officials approved in August a mixture of bacteria-killing viruses that can be added to ready-to-eat foods.

The viruses will be sprayed on cold cuts, hot dogs and sausages in an effort to combat microbes that are responsible for hundreds of deaths a year.

The viruses, called bacteriophages, were designed to kill strains of Listeria monocytogenes bacterium. The FDA declared the viruses safe to add to food, making the phages the first viruses ever to win agency approval.

An estimated 2,500 people become ill with listeriosis every year, and according to the Centers for Disease Control, 500 of them die.

The FDA says that the bacteriophages, a Greek term meaning "bacteria-eater," are grown in a preparation of the bacteria they are meant to kill. Then they are purified and ready to spray on food.

Other than the fact that ready-to-eat meats are going to be sprayed with viruses, critics don't like the idea that consumers won't be aware which products have been sprayed, meaning they won't even get the option of choosing to eat virus-treated foods or not.

The Department of Agriculture will regulate the use of the phages, and the FDA concluded that they are safe as long as the viruses are used in accordance with regulations.

Supporters say that the phages are designed to only attack the bacteria that they are designed to go after and won't affect humans. We are already surrounded by phages, which are present in water, soil, our intestines, mucus membranes and elsewhere.

But the question still remains if whether these viruses are really safe, despite the fact that they received FDA approval.

We will take a more indepth look at bacteriophages in the KIMA Journal Issue 10, which is due out in December.

We need your contributions!

Many people in the Philippines don't have adequate health care because they simply can't afford it. Doctors on the front line can't buy vitamins and supplements for their patients who can't pay for them.

But they have their two hands, and that's all they need to benefit from The KI Method!

Dr. Glenn King will be traveling to Manila, Philippines to share The KI Method® with hundreds of doctors in one of the poorest nations in the world. Most Philipinos can't afford health care in the form of medication, medical supplies or even vitamins and herbs.

Be a part of this labor of love by partnering with the King Institute, Inc. to sponsor Dr. King. Any amount that you contribute will be greatly appreciated, and every contribution will receive a tax-deductible receipt from the Institute.

Simply visit our web site to make a donation online or call 1-800-640-7998.

Thank you and God bless!
